About the Workshop

With classrooms full of unique learners, teachers are challenged to enable all students to attain competencies. Teachers have long known that students need a supportive climate for learning and that knowing the learner is essential to providing appropriate learning experiences. Participants will examine current cognitive research related to how humans learn, as well as the theory of Multiple Intelligences. Instructional and assessment strategies that support how the brain learns and retains information will be explored. A framework and new models will be shared to provide a variety of learning and assessment strategies from which teachers can differentiate instruction and assessment to enable unique learners to reach standards.

Participants will have the opportunity to:

- Develop a shared understanding of differentiation.
- Examine current theories and brain research in relationship to conditions needed for diverse learners to attain standards.
- Become familiar with the elements needed for a differentiated classroom, including creating the climate, knowing the learner, assessing the learner, adjusting and compacting, instructional best practice and curriculum approaches.
- Explore and practice instructional and assessment tools and models needed in order to differentiate instruction.
